Dear Joe:

As you pointed out in your recent e-mail correspondence with Bob Alden and Mel Olken, small Sections and Chapters are especially vulnerable to financial shifts and deteriorating economy. Desperate times call for desperate measures -- but we think creativity works best, and creativity in meeting planning can reap great results. For your consideration, I have passed on a few ideas which have been used successfully by others.

1. Schedule a meeting series - which can be held in one day, in a single location (corporate or university locations work especially well) and can use the same speaker(s) if needed. The full Section meeting might be first on the day long (or half day) agenda. Then the Chapter meetings can follow in breakout fashion, either sequentially, in parallel or some combination. Meeting reports can be issued for the Section meeting portion, and for each individual Chapter meeting. The uniqueness of each session is validated through attendance reporting, speaker topic and so on. Meeting rebate credit for this type of arrangement is issued for the Section meeting (often a professional - rather than a technical - topic is presented during this portion), and for each individual Chapter meeting. Small Chapters find this especially useful, as shared resources, facility, publicity and promotion work quite well. Chapter identity is retained, the networking between Chapters - and the overall Section - is facilitated and, where corporate or university locations are used, the IEEE role in the community may also be enhanced. Section and Chapter officers using this approach indicate that it unifies the Section, increases Section/Chapter understanding and relationships, and optimizes the rebate. A bi-monthly meeting series, for example, provides six opportunities for this kind of networking and technical information sharing; with additional social and professional sessions filling in the annual schedule.

2. Another approach which works well where Section and/or Chapter members are spread out (as in the case where one major employer is downtown, and the other is further out in the county, for example) is to book the same speaker but schedule two meetings. With all other requirements being met, this certainly qualifies as two meetings -- but again, shared resources and information make the meeting more accessible to membership, make the speaker search a bit simpler (one not two), and optimizes the rebate.

I hope these ideas are useful...and welcome any feedback you may have.

Regards,
Terry
